Laiyi is a recipient of numerous first place awards from competitions in the GTA. She currently studies violin with both her grandfather, Tak Ng Lai and mother Joyce Lai. Laiyi also attends regular private coachings with TSO concertmaster, Jonathan Crow.

About the Trees by Kye Marshall

We are now discovering that trees are 'social creatures'. Through root networks they share water and nutrients and send each other distress signals warning about impending drought and disease. Humans have relied on trees for many things including shelter and fuel and crucially creating the oxygen we need to survive. We also need to trees to build stringed instruments and bows! Canada has a wealth of trees which we often take for granted. Sadly our trees are under threat from the effects of rapid climate change and deforestation. This composition celebrates five of our magnificent Canadian trees and hopefully brings attention to their fragility in a changing world.

The Maple. Perhaps our best beloved tree, Maples have diverse uses, providing valuable hardwood for furniture and flooring, serving as ornamental trees for shade and aesthetics, and in the making of stringed instruments such as the back, sides and neck of the violin. It is of course the source of our delicious Maple Syrup. In this movement one might hear the running of the Syrup and experience the rich palette of glorious Autumn colours in the multi coloured wind section.

The White Spruce is Canada's northern most tree. It coats it's short, blue-green needles with wax thus conserving water during the very cold winters when soil water is frozen. Spruce wood is commonly used for the soundboard or top of stringed instruments. It survives in freezing temperatures, as portrayed in this movement by stark violin melodies. The cold low persistent bass note eventually transforms into a melodic refrain of survival.

The White Pine is the most majestic of trees, growing to a height of 150 feet. It's wood is highly valued and thus often harvested in it's prime. This is 'narrative' or program music movement- telling a story. It opens with a proud regal chorale which is interrupted by the timpani and bass drum representing both foresters and elements of climate degradation. Chaos ensues. Protesters try and stop the devastation but are unsuccessful. The movement ends with the opening chorale which is abruptly cut off.

The Weeping Willow This graceful giant, known for its open crown of wispy, ground-sweeping branches and long, slender leaves provides a perfect home for birds. Willows are useful for Carbon sequestration, water health, and regenerative farming practices. In this composition the Willow does indeed weep through the plaintiff bassoon and mournful strings for the destruction of trees by foresters and by environmental degradation.

The Poplar This fast growing tree is very useful for winter windbreaks and soil remediation making them a valuable species in forestry and environmental applications. Its graceful, upward-stretching branches and bright leaves seem to touch the sky, while its deep roots connecting it to the earth as may be heard in the orchestra. This tree has oval, heart-shaped leaves that grow close together, fluttering in the wind. One can hear the leaves dancing especially with the tambourine and marimba.
